

Argumentative Essay About Death Penalty Should Be Abolished

The death penalty should be abolished. It is a cruel and unusual punishment that has been used throughout history and in many countries, but it should no longer be an acceptable form of punishment. Studies have shown that the death penalty does not deter crime, and there are numerous cases of wrongful convictions which cannot be undone if the person is executed. It also disproportionately affects minority populations and people with mental illness. Furthermore, it is an inhumane form of state-sanctioned revenge that should not be condoned by any civilized society.

The death penalty does not deter crime; instead, it serves as a type of closure for the victim's family and friends. However, there is no evidence that it actually prevents crime. In fact, some studies have suggested that when states with the death penalty abolish it, violent crime decreases. Furthermore, capital punishment can be costly and lengthy due to appeals and other legal processes. This money could be better spent on social programs that would benefit society as a whole instead of punishing one individual.

Another major problem with the death penalty is its potential for wrongful convictions. Although there are safeguards to try and prevent this from occurring, many innocent people have been convicted and even executed. Once a person is put to death, it cannot be undone; thus, any mistakes made in the legal system are irreversible. The risk of executing an innocent person is simply too great and should not be taken lightly.

The death penalty also disproportionately affects minorities, people with low incomes, and those with mental illness. Research has shown that these groups are more likely to receive the death penalty than other populations. This is due to a combination of factors including unequal access to legal representation, discrimination based on race or economic status, and a lack of understanding of mental illness. Furthermore, the death penalty is rarely used against those who commit white collar crimes; instead, they receive more lenient sentences that involve probation or community service.

The death penalty should not be condoned by any civilized society. It is an inhumane form of state-sanctioned revenge that does not directly benefit society. It does not serve as a deterrent for crime, and instead of providing closure for victims' families, it only serves to compound the tragedy of their loved one's death. Furthermore, it disproportionately affects minority populations and those with mental illness and is prone to wrongful convictions. For these reasons, the death penalty should be abolished.

In conclusion, the death penalty should no longer be an acceptable form of punishment and should instead be abolished. It is a cruel and unusual punishment that does not serve to deter crime and can lead to wrongful convictions. Furthermore, it disproportionately affects minority groups and those with mental illness. For these reasons, the death penalty should be abolished and replaced with more humane forms of punishment. It is time for society to take a stand against this inhumane practice and abolish the death penalty once and for all.
